THE COMPREHENSIVE LINKEDIN GUIDE

If you're anything like me, you've spent the last several years here wondering if you have impostor syndrome or you're just too useless for the working world. Every year, 600ish fresh high school graduates are sent away by their families and thrown into an isolated bubble in rural Ohio filled with sleep deprivation, alcohol, and the freedom to make terrible choices. This collection of deer in the headlights, all from a wide range of backgrounds with their own unique life experiences, are united by a common goal: learning stuff. That (understandably) isn't always the way it goes. Some days you're putting the final touches on an essay that you firmly believe is your magnum opus, and other days you wake up 30 minutes before your first class covered in blood for a reason that you can't recall. It's a bit of a daunting task to summarize your entire college experience to a prospective employer in an appealing way at the end of what feels like a four year pipe dream, but I firmly believe that white lies are the solution to any problem that the world throws at you. Here's the comprehensive guide to setting up your Business Facebook LinkedIn page to make it seem like you deserve a salary and health insurance someday.

THE PROFILE PHOTO

This is step one, and will be the first thing any important business person sees when they decide to give you a glance. If you weren't forced to take a professional headshot by a fraternity or sorority (or you were wearing a cowboy hat in every single one), you're gonna have to get creative. Take a selfie at a slight angle that allows people to look straight up into your nostrils, and make sure you're wearing a nice t-shirt that doesn't have any stains on it. If you've been looking like garbage lately, just use your yearbook photo from your senior year of high school.

WORK EXPERIENCE

You haven't been doing a damn thing, but that's ok. Throw that summer gig you had at Arby's on there, but make it sound professional. Refer to yourself as a "Client Services Associate", and instead of saying that you got screamed at through a drive through window by bottom feeders who were moments away from spilling cheese sauce all over their sad little selves in their sad little car in a sad little parking lot thinking about their sad little life, say that you "built loyal clientele through friendly interactions and consistent appreciation". Leave out the fact that you got fired for repeatedly being a no-show by the second month.

RELEVANT SKILLS

Your broad liberal arts education has taught you what globalization is and also destroyed any positive view you may have once held towards the history of this nation, but you likely haven't developed many hard skills. Did you ever have to redo a paper you got a D on? If so, throw "editing" on that list. Teamwork, Microsoft Office, and typing are also key essentials that will be sure to help land you a job. Don't forget to include the language that you took for two years in high school that you've still never successfully managed to have a conversation with.

CONNECTIONS

ANNOY. EVERYONE. Nobody should be safe from your connection request barrage. You may not have professional connections, but making it seem like you do is a cakewalk. Did you find the profile of your middle school best friend's dad who owns his own company? Send it. Some random girl you had a history class with freshman year? Send it. Adam Weinberg? Send it (he'll accept <3). If you keep putting yourself out there at everyone else's expense, your connection database will inevitably multiply faster than a head louse in a public elementary school.

INTERESTS

Here's where those white lies come in. Nobody cares about your interests, and you don't even have any interests that are relevant to the soul-sucking corporate world that you're about enter anyway. If you're an economics/global commerce burnout, add pages like Jordan Belfort's or maybe Goldman Sachs. If you're graduating with a BS, throw some companies on there that you have absolutely zero hope of ever working at (NASA, Google, BP, etc.). Basically, think about the nonexistent dream version of you who has their life together, and add whatever interests you think they'd have. Pretending to care about things is much easier than actually being a well-rounded person.

VOLUNTEERING

You may not think that you've volunteered before, but you can stretch this one pretty far. Have you given blood at least twice before? Congratulations, you're a regular donor to the Red Cross. Ever given your bum of a roommate a swipe into Curtis because they spent the year gorging themselves on seven dollar cinnamon rolls? That's basically a small-scale food drive. Add any things that you were required to participate in but wouldn't have done of your own free will, like picking up trash with your high school bio class on Earth day.
