GRIFFIN'S WEEKEND EXTRAVAGANZA

How was my break you ask? It sucked!!! After a rough start to this year, I hoped for a relaxing time of beaches and pina colodas, but most importantly a break from the Hill. Unfortunately, due to some classic Spirit Airlines "customer service" my flight to Punta Cana was rescheduled to next week. No go. So I took my $15 dollars in future travel credit and prepared myself for spring break in Granville.

At first I thought "You know what? This isn't so bad". But then the sun set. When the piercing gales hit after dark I remembered I was not beachside in the Caribbean. It also didn't help that as the weekend went on, my carefully pre-planned outfits did not work with my lack of geographical change. Believe me when I tell you Onia board shorts do NOT provide any thermal insulation.

As I tried to go about having a fun weekend I kept running into different things being closed or just off vibes. I tried rattling the doors of Common Grounds for a pick me up coffee several times. Realizing my more than necessary Frozen Chai would not be available till Monday hurt. HURT. On top of losing the pop up/late night on a usual evening, I also had the Nest ripped away from me. Painful to say the least...

When I woke up Sunday, I had this intense desire to make use of my free day. I decided to spend the day checking out the trails in the Bio Reserve. Unfortunately, my outfit for Sunday was a white linen matching set. I tried my very best to still explore the 350 acres available to me, but it was not as enjoyable as I would have thought. Even flipping up my camp collar did not help with the wind. The more I travelled, the lanky trees seemed to blend into each other even more than their usual indistinguishability. I will admit, I got lost. It bothered me that the Bio Reserve did not have handy resort style signs that told me where things were. Luckily, since I was wearing shorts and Havaianas, I had no issues going off the beaten path and just walking through creek beds to get out.

Monday I realized I need a legitimate change of scenery. I convinced a friend to drive me to the Columbus Zoo. However, the animals seemed to be feeling the same way. As I wandered around the grounds, the only animals that seemed to be out were ones that seemed perfect for fur coats. The arctic foxes enjoyed the piercing wind and lounged happily. The grizzly bears had no issue resting on rocks and logs with huge grins on their faces. Gray wolves were more than content with their surroundings. I envied the Elephants and Rhinos that decided they belonged inside and got to play with giant bunches of straw. Okay, clarification. I don't envy the straw, just the huge indoor and heated enclosure. Later, I stepped into the amphibian and reptile enclosure, that's when I felt real jealousy. Heat lamp galore. Accurate and beautiful reanchments of tropical, jungle, and desert settings. Reminded me of the non refundable jungle tour I missed out on.

Tuesday I decided to accept my fate. My game plan was to tuck into movies and TV and just have a true staycation vibe. After picking up my Slayter grill order, I pre-gamed with an episode and a half of Big Little Lies. It was then time for Little Women (2019). On top of it being cast with regular sized women, it also was not a feel good pick me up. I then decided to see what was trending on Netflix. I saw that Mila Kunis starred in a movie called Luckiest Girl Alive (2022). Unfortunately for me, and her charler Ani, she was not lucky at all. Like so far from luck. Wow.

Happy Spring Break to those who celebrate.
