DENISON SELLS HOMESTEAD LAND RIGHTS TO BIG OIL, REQUIRES NEW FRACKING WORK-STUDY FOR HOMESTEADERS

Denison announced this week that the land rights to the homestead had been sold to Big Oil. The announcement comes after weeks of rumours surrounding the future of the homestead and whether it will continue to exist. Under the new deal, the homestead will be able to continue operations in an exciting new capacity - as an independent community of students passionate about the environment and sustainability, interested in living off the grid, and required to work 18 hour shifts on two new fracking rigs.

Here at the Bullsheet, we pride ourselves in our commitment to journalism and student representation. As such, we polled students outside of slayter on how they would react. Henry Long '26, from Charleston, WV, said that he was "happy to hear that Denison was moving towards non-renewables, but upset that [Denison] didn't choose coal." Long, like all West Virginians, spent his childhood working in the coal mines, and was hoping that he would be able to continue his work on campus. Another student, Andrew Byerly '27 from San Antonio, Texas, said that "In keeping with Denison student tradition when approaching an issue, I'll probably be really upset over it for a week or two, then forget about it even though its still a problem."
